Writing a Research Paper: From the Parts to the Whole

Antonio Dias de Figueiredo
University of Coimbra, Portugal

Abstract

Good research paper writing can be made much simpler than most people think, provided a few important principles are kept in mind. We cover these principles here, as we go through a brief description of the successive parts of a typical research paper. We hope this will help young researchers achieve in a short time the high standards expected at top international journals and conferences.

Keywords: conference, journal, paper writing, research, scientific writing, writing.

The tradition of research paper writing and peer reviewing dates back to 1665, when Henry Oldenburg, the German tutor of Charles Boyle's nephew, inspired Great Britain's Royal Society to start to publish the Philosophical Transactions (Boorstin, 1988). The "parliament of scientists" resulting from this "network of correspondence" became the universal scientific community of our days (Boorstin, 1988). In spite of the many centuries passed since the inception of the Philosophical Transactions, we still observe its basic model, which gradually materialized into a small and universally agreed set of principles. Any scientist from any part of the world who becomes familiar with these principles will become a natural member of the worldwide parliament of scientists. He or she must, however, be able to master the principles. The aim of this text is to revisit the principles in the context of a simplified research paper that concentrates on how to write research papers. To keep it short and easily actionable, the paper covers only two main sections, one devoted to the description of the conventional components of a research paper, and another that discusses some additional considerations.

The Components of a Research Paper

The components of a research paper are presented here in the order in which they are read. This order may not correspond, however, to the order in which most papers are written. In practice, as we shall see, the introduction to the paper and the final version of the abstract are often the last parts to be written.

Title. The title describes in a logical, rigorous, brief and grammatically sound way the essence of the paper. Sometimes it is made up of two parts, the title and a subtitle, separated by a colon, as in the case of this paper.

Author and affiliation. The name of the author (or authors) is given below the title, followed by the indication of the institution to which the author belongs. The email address of the author is often also required.

Amidst the trials and tribulations, [Author's Name] discovered a sanctuary in the realm of creativity. Through writing, she poured her heart and soul onto the page, finding solace and expression amidst the challenges she faced. Her words became a refuge, a safe haven where she could explore her emotions and process her experiences.

The Power of Perspective: Embracing Gratitude

In the depths of adversity, [Author's Name] discovered the transformative power of gratitude. Instead of dwelling on her misfortunes, she chose to focus on the blessings in her life, no matter how small. Through this shift in perspective, she found a wellspring of strength that sustained her through even the darkest of times.
