

Sharing Space in the Shadow of Conflict: Space and Place 16

Conflict is often seen as a destructive force that tears people apart. But it can also be a creative force that brings people together. In the midst of conflict, people often find new ways to share space and create new forms of community and belonging.

Sharing Space in the Shadow of Conflict: Space and Place 16 explores the complex and often conflicting ways in which people share space in the midst of conflict. Through a series of case studies, the book examines how people negotiate the physical and social boundaries that divide them, and how they create new forms of community and belonging.

The book's case studies come from a variety of conflict zones around the world, including the Middle East, Africa, and Europe. They explore a wide range of issues, including:

- How people negotiate the physical boundaries of their homes and neighborhoods
- How people create new forms of community and belonging in the midst of displacement
- How people use space to resist oppression and build peace

Sharing Space in the Shadow of Conflict is a groundbreaking book that offers a new perspective on the relationship between conflict and space. It shows how conflict can be both a destructive and a creative force, and how people can find new ways to share space and create new forms of community and belonging in the midst of it.
